

Writing used to be only for those few educated individuals that had a command of the English language.

That has changed, writing is no longer just for the elite, it is also for just about anyone it is a method of voicing your feelings how you think how your vision might one day change the world or even just a small part of it.

How writing has changed in the recent years and how you should be adapting to that change.

How people read and speak English may be changing over time and how you should be adapting your writing style to match what readers expect to see.

There are several distinctions in how people read in these instances, the way people read is different.

Books, Electronic, Reports, Ebooks, MP3 Recordings, and more, each of these mediums have a unique flow that effects the writing.

The publishing world is changing and it is becoming such a different thing so much so that the level of proficiency required in publishing content has changed.

No longer is it required to have perfect English skills, much of the content that has been produced over the last two years has been providential in nature.

There are many different methods of writing, the target audience often determines the style of writing that is delivered.

Writing for the web is a style of writing that is evolving over the last few years, from what was once considered a very strict interpretation of writing to a more relaxed form of writing.

We have even begun to see a different language emerge in the form of using shorter abbreviations, of commonly used words, such as LOL, or ROFL, which evolved in chat rooms back in the early part of the 1990s to say that is old is an understatement, yet new users are being introduced to this language all the time.

Because readers online tend to scan through long text, some writers have begun to outline, certain passages, that are more important to the reader, by using caps on certain parts of the text so that the reader understands that those sections are more important. Giving speed readers or scanners, as some are called, a visual cue using Capitol letters in certain parts of a text message, is an interesting method of writing, it is not proper English and many people online object to its use however, it is something that is gaining popularity in many different parts of the internet on essay writing sites like PaperLeaf or other.

Learning to write for the web is part skill and part language observation.

Language believe it or not is still evolving, words and phrases have different meaning now than say even as little as 30 years ago, the word gay for instance, used to describe a mode or frame of mind, today it describes a life style, associated, with what is often referred to as an alternative life style, yet, these words have not changed at all, they are still spelled the same. The meaning in society has changed, not the word itself, this is because language and the state of being is always changing.

What meant one thing years ago can have a completely different meaning now.

Just because a word has a stable definition now does not mean that the meaning of the word or even the language cannot change in the future.

Slang words are increasingly being used online, in a tangible way that can cause confusion if your not in the loop.